

WHEREAS, victims of crime deserve support, options, services, and hope, and that these aid in the journey from victim to survivor to thriver helping to heal both individuals and communities from violence; and

WHEREAS, victim advocates and victim service providers help survivors rebuild their lives through coping with the impact of crime, educating on legal rights and options, connecting to victim compensation and other resources, developing safety plans, and navigating the criminal justice, civil justice, and social service systems; and

WHEREAS, each one of us – friends, family members, coworkers and colleagues, neighbors, community leaders, victim service providers, criminal justice practitioners, and health and helping professionals has the opportunity to enhance the lives of crime victims through our words, our actions, and our support; and

WHEREAS, we ask today that you engage in information and training to prepare yourselves in being trauma-informed, victim-centered, and resource-ready so that you can confidently respond when someone confides in you about victimization, and to create safer and more comfortable environments for crime victims to share what happened to them and in doing so, provide them with support, options for life-changing and sometimes life-saving services, and most importantly, hope.
